WHAT LORDLY CREATURE

The most complicated piece of machinery under the sun. It is good condition, possessing an almost unlimited capacity for work. It is out of gear, as unable to get up the hill of life decently as it used to. Wanting but little to keep him in the best of order, claiming but a few minutes of extra under the plea of the necessity for comfort and luxury. Turning up in all parts of the world, sometimes in a black coat, sometimes in a black skin; in the regions of civilization seeking protection from the elements by means of brick and mortar, wood and stone; in the wilderness, when in a state of anarchy, content with the broad canopy of heaven.

Two to the civilised side of the subject, and we have a moment of considering what are the wants and requirements of this

MASTERPIECE OF CREATION.

A house to live in, or decent lodging somewhere, for all who can by hook or by crook get out of jail is needed and necessary; and what is a house without its fuel, its food, its comforts, and its home-like attractions! The householder, a shanty from which the builder retires unable to put the rest in touch, through which culminates in its occupation by the CRIMINALS, the CANALS, the CHAIRS, the STOVES and the DISHERS, the MOUSETRAP.

The householder and the MANGLE must all in the end be satisfied, and the Spoon must have a share of the attention. The same war; and the thing won't be at all complete until the stint, and HOUSEHOLD. The Farmers and Wine Glasses without stint. Likewise the title of MAN under consideration would find him decidedly at sea without many other things, such as, SOUT, Cash Boxes, and possibly, in times of derangement of the mind, machinery, COCAKE'S PILL, Nor does the foregoing man know an unknown quantity away from his OIL, Hobble, and Note Paper. Yet there are others, for so ST. JACOB'S OIL has allowed for SILK, straw Hats, ST. JACOB'S OIL, and has without which needed addenda, nakodene, sundrils, and, in the end, and unpleasant cutaneous symptoms are pretty as to supervene. The title of MAN is not only common, and the terrible list of male humanity's (partly) is not enough to appeal a dab at compiling or frighten him into St. JACOB'S OIL.

place where the thing is done, where the list is completed, the busy period, the sum total added up, checked, tested, and made sure, where the manifestation of prudent expenditure is assured by magnificent economy which pervades everything, leaves nothing untouched, and casts a glow of glorious pleasure over the whole performance. Need it be said, is it necessary to add, the place of places, this store of stores, this cosmopolitan EMPORIUM, where everything is sold, and where everything is both good and cheap, is

But our desire is to make a meaning plain, to leave nothing for ambiguity to boast of, and therefore we feel justified in existing for service to a small circle of persons, and especially illustrative of this difference we desire to point out the difference between the two sides of the noble quadrangle, which, according to the very best authorities, is the difference of class. As for it, women's wants are many—not that we, as UNIVERSAL PROVIDER object, as from our point of view, the more the merrier. But, as a matter of fact, it must be admitted, that the more the women are as the pebbles on the ocean beach, as the stars in the firmament. A NATURAL TONIC.—HEALTHY BILE.—When the liver is not making healthy bile in sufficient quantity, the blood becomes impure—the groundwork of disease—and produces constipation, dyspepsia, biliousness, headache, &c. Endo's Fruit Salt is the remedy for all these ailments. I have seen Endo's Fruit Salt cure, for six years, and I willingly endorse the statement that Endo's Fruit Salt is imperatively necessary to the enjoyment of perfect health. By its use many kinds of food will agree which otherwise would produce weakness. Caution.—Legal rights are reserved in this official writing.

Yet the article is not a pleasant one to read, for it shows the seamy side of Dickens's character, and makes one see more clearly than ever that a man of genius is not fitted for the role of a domestic animal. Sometimes, according to Mrs. Christian, Dickens was rude and unscrupulous.

CENTRAL UMBRELLA ELECTON.

W. H. Wesley, of Carlington, has published his announcing himself as a free lance, and a counsel of the Government.
Dunbar, of Harris Park, Paramatta, has issued circulars, stating that he intended to contest the free-trade interests.
A fresh polling place has been appointed at the residence of Mr. Wesley (23), at Bethel-stead, it does not increase the number of places, but substitutes for the one at the George River
the one at the residence of Mr. Wesley.

at Dundas, and Irish Town as Upper Bazaar.
These alterations
result of the recommendations of the returning officer.
The Paramatta Protection League was held to select a candidate to contest the election for the seat in the House of Representatives.
The object of the League is to protect the interests of the free-trade, and to secure the election of a candidate who will be a friend of the free-trade.
The League was formed on the 1st of January, and it was decided to leave the management of the League to the hands of a committee. Messrs. J. G. G. G.

Marrable, of course, has a horror of matrimony any shape, until in a weak moment he succumbs to the fatal influence of his irresistible lady, Mr. Titherage, who has always been Sydney favourite, depicts the part of Robert Bramley with great success. The scene at the end of the first act between this would-be benefactor and his landlady and her son (Mr. Titherage), is a really fine piece of acting, which provokes hearty laughter. The piece "holds its own," the saying is, and will doubtless for some time occupy the boards. There is a strong cast, and what looked for by pleasure-seekers—plenty of fun from "The Bachelors," which the Brough and Boucicault Comedy Company

The Squire in his manner hall, the ballroom appears disguised as secretary of the Duke of Berkeleyshire to announce that his master has been obliged to break down of their carriage. Thus they gain admittance to the house, and at odds of night, when all have retired to rest, Blanche the squire and pretend to rob him taking care, however, to cause no much disturbance than they are forced to debase in haste. But from it is discovered that she had been deceived by her own promises to accept, and of course the squire persuades "his fiancee" to accept as a loan the sum of which he says he was robbed; but being unable to bear the loss, that a guest who had been invited to dine there had done so, and on the evening, Geoffrey and Silverwood have proved their wickedness of heart, by not only forgetting their rustic vows, but also positively making love to Dorothy. In consequence of this, they both leave the house, and go to London, where they find, all they drew attachment to the wrong ladies, Geoffrey choosing Lydia, and Dorothy being wooed by Silverwood, and both being happy in their new attachments. In fact, the rustic bridegroom is exchanged to a village wedding where once more "Dorcas and Abigail" hold their swain's captives. Meanwhile the two rash woosers of the moonlight withdraw their pledges; and the two girls plot a mock demand to test the real value of the protestations of these gentlemen, who receive challenges accordingly. At length Dorothy and Lydia, the satisfaction of hearing their fickle lovers show their fealty to their rustic loves by declaring their preference to them, and the arrival of the Duke of Berkeleyshire, who favours of the ladies of high degree. Of course, the dance is stopped in time by the arrival of the squire, whose daughter Larcher, the bailiff, has revealed everything, and of course all the complications are brought to a happy solution.

MR. DAMPIER'S BENEFIT.

The farewell benefit tendered by the numerous admirers evening at the Gaiety Theatre, in the presence of a large audience. Before referring to the programme, a few words dering for the entertainment of the public it is no secret that managers or lessees are compelled for their own profit to present a bill of fare which is likely to offend the public taste. It is not, however, likely to offend the financial taste. Mr. Dampier, while recognizing this inexorable fact, has evidently also kept prominently in view the possibilities of artistic success. He has done his best to hit the popular taste, he can also truthfully say that he has never presented any piece

 the public which could fairly be said to approach vulgarity.
 He has been able to combine the artistic and the popular artistic delicacy, but he is entitled to the credit of endeavouring to keep the profession of which he and his family are so worthy and proud, members free from the taint of the stage. Mr. Dampier's company, which has been which terminated last season, has extended for no less period than over two and a-half years. He commenced at the Theatre Royal, Sydney, in 1871, and has since that time the Standard Theatre, and during the long season named he was supported by the same company with very few alterations, a fact which speaks volumes for his professional qualities. He is no doubt, as we saw Sydney and he will, no doubt, take with him no
 the best wishes of the public for his future success.

The Auckland Trades and Labour Council have passed a resolution in favour of joint action being taken by the New Zealand Government with the Australian Governments relative to the Chinese question, and affirming that meantime a poll-tax of £100 should be imposed and a residential tax of £20.

The bill to be introduced by the New Zealand Government dealing with Chinese immigrants will increase the poll-tax to £100.

The Chinese difficulty is accentuated by the arrival of the Tainan with a number of immigrants for this and the other Australian ports. The number booked for Sydney, 45, is about double as many as the vessel, under ordinary circumstances, would be entitled to bring, but it is understood that some of the Chinese possess exemption tickets, that is to say, tickets exempting them from payment of the poll-tax on the ground that they have resided in the colony before, while others are provided with naturalisation papers.

The remainder, it is said, are prepared to pay the poll-tax. But public opinion is against the introduction of any more Chinese, and the Government is confronted with a somewhat difficult problem. How is it to keep out all Chinamen, and at the same time pay proper respect to the law, which sanctions the admission of Chinese under certain restrictions? If the exemption certificates and naturalisation papers are bona fide, and payment of the poll-tax is tendered by those who do not possess certificates or naturalisation papers, how can the landing of the Chinese be legally prevented? The necessity for immediately deciding the point has been avoided by ordering the Tainan into quarantine on the perfectly legitimate ground that she brought to the wharf three stowaways who had not been examined by the Health Officer. The question as a whole is to be considered by the Executive Council to-day, and pending the decision of the Government, no Chinese are to be permitted to land from either the Tainan or the Afghan.

From the reply given by the PREMIER yesterday to the deputation from the Town Hall meeting we gather that the Government is satisfied of its ability to meet in a satisfactory manner the emergency which has arisen.

With regard to the Afghan arrangement had been entered into, which "would result in the whole of the Chinese making their way out of the country as soon as they could." A proprietor of a plantation in one of the islands had offered to employ a certain number of them, and these would be carried to the island. Those who refused to go would be sent back to China. The same plan will be adopted, we presume, with the passengers by the Tainan. Of course, if the Chinese agree to pass us by and go elsewhere no trouble will be experienced; but in case of their refusal how can we send back to China those who are legally entitled to land here?

The Government, we imagine, intends to act upon the Melbourne precedent. The Chinese brought by the Afghan to that port presented naturalisation papers, which were apparently fraudulent, and as no proof to the contrary could be given the whole of the immigrants were treated as though they were non-naturalised. On that basis they were entitled to land on payment of the poll-tax, but as the Afghan could only legally carry 14 non-naturalised Chinamen, the captain had before him the prospect of paying penalties amounting to over £5000.

On condition that he took the Chinese elsewhere the Victorian Government undertook not to prosecute, and these terms were accepted. The Sydney passengers by the Afghan are probably in the same position as those who were booked for Melbourne, and may be got rid of without any further trouble, and the case of the Tainan may present no greater difficulty than that of the Afghan.

But the arrangement of matters in this way will only tide over the present emergency; it will not remove the ever-recurring difficulty. Chinese have been brought by the hundred by vessels like the Afghan and Tainan, because it has been assumed that the naturalisation papers would give those who held them the entire to Australia; but when it is found that these documents will not be accepted unless proof can be given that they are properly in the hands of those who present them, the game will be given up, and vessels which come from the Chinese ports to these colonies will simply bring the statutory number of non-naturalised Chinamen—that is to say, one for every 100 tons—and if the law remains as it now stands the tender of the amount of the poll tax would give the immigrants a legal right to land.

The invasion at this rate would not be a very serious affair, but still the Chinese would come, and what the people of Australia have resolved upon is that they will have no more of them.

But if John Chinaman is to be entirely banned or "practically excluded," as contemplated by the PREMIER, it will be necessary to alter the law. This, of course, is seen by the Government, who, according to Sir HENRY PARKES, have fresh legislation in view. The increase of the poll tax from £10 to £100 would "practically exclude" the Chinese, and there would be little difficulty we suppose, in getting the various Australian Parliaments to legislate in this direction.

The next step would be to get the sanction of Great Britain to such legislation.

"A fig for Great Britain, and a fig for her treaty obligations," says the resolution adopted at the Town Hall meeting; but, as the PREMIER pointed out to the deputation yesterday, it is impossible to ignore Great Britain and her treaties. So long as we remain part of Great Britain, we must be bound by treaty rights; in other words, we cannot carry our legislation against the Chinese to such a point as would infringe treaty obligations. Assuming that we are unable to arrange matters with the home Government—a very improbable contingency—there is, of course, the alternative of separation. But, supposing that the Australian colonies insisted upon separating from the mother country, so as to have a perfectly free hand to deal with the Chinese question, how would they be likely to fare? What chance would they have, with such an enormous territory, open at so many points, and with so small a population, of keeping out the Chinese, if the Chinese were bent upon coming in? According to more than one authority, the Chinese Government have no desire that their people should scatter themselves over the world, but would prefer that they should remain at home and develop the resources of their own country.

We published recently a letter from the Rev. Mr. GRANGER to this effect, and an article contributed to the Nineteenth Century by Sir JOHN POKER HENNESSY, late Governor of Hongkong, which is referred to elsewhere, bears testimony to the reluctance of the governing classes in China to part with their people. But the truth or otherwise of these statements does not affect the argument. It is assumed here that the Chinese Government has planned an invasion of Australia, and the best way to resist the invasion, according to some members of yesterday's deputation, is to separate from Great Britain. Sir HENRY PARKES showed the folly of doing any such thing. "If we separated from Great Britain to-morrow, we should be as helpless as children in regard to the Chinese." Her inexhaustible numbers and the great advances she was making in the civilised arts, especially the art of war, the PREMIER meant, no doubt, to say, "would make China a formidable power, and she could, if she liked, make a Chinese settlement of Australia in spite of the colonies." This is an extreme view, perhaps, but there can be no doubt that without the help of Great Britain the colonial Governments would be unable to keep the Chinese out of Australia if they were determined to get in.

If we are wise, therefore, we shall discourage silly talk about separation, and support the Government in the efforts it is making in conjunction with the other Australian Governments to induce the authorities at home to make an arrangement with the Chinese Government which will relieve us from all difficulty, and settle for ever a question which grows more and more troublesome every year. There is no occasion for excitement or agitation because the Home Government has not done at the moment—and before it has been fully informed as to the wishes of the Australian community—exactly what the PREMIER of this colony asked it to do.

When the English Ministers realise the Australian position, and become aware of the fixed determination of the people not to be swamped by an inferior race, it will scarcely be in their power to refuse help. Should emergencies arise in the meantime, we ought to be able to meet them without any display of excitement or passion.

Some remarks that fell from the BISHOP of SYDNEY at a recent meeting of the Christian Evidence Society have given rise to an interesting controversy. His LORDSHIP referred to "curious and lamentable loss of the higher aesthetic tastes" on the part of the late CHARLES DARWIN which the Professor himself describes in the recently-published biography by his son. Eager apologists hastened to defend the great scientist in the correspondence columns of the Herald, and the interest taken in the discussion affords very satisfactory evidence of the extent to which such subjects occupy the attention of thinking people. But the writers of these letters appear to take widely different views of the question. One writer seems to find in the results of scientific discovery something like a convincing argument against revealed religion, while another deduces that "DARWIN's scientific researches must have had a fearfully darkening influence on his mind when, through them, the writings of SHAKESPEARE became dull and nauseous to him." Another correspondent suggests that DARWIN should not be judged by the common-place standard of the majority of men, and thinks it possible "that a man who all his life has been a seeker after fact, should find fiction, in whatever form and however beautifully portrayed, had an insipid recreation for his great intellect." And yet a fourth correspondent apophthegmatically lays it down in this connection that "the law of life is the permutation of force"—and in this remark states a general law that really seems adequately to cover the whole question at issue.

There can be no doubt that this singular loss of the aesthetic tastes that Dr. BARRY referred to really existed. DARWIN himself is perfectly clear on that point. He says himself, in one of the most touching passages in all autobiography—though not for the reason that some of our correspondents seem to think—that he had entirely lost all sense of enjoyment on the aesthetic side of his consciousness. Music and art, the strange sights and sweet sounds of Nature, and the world of intellectual delight wrapped up in the great volumes of literature—all this was a closed field to him. He lost his love for Shakespeare, and even music failed to stir him. His mind, he said, had become a mere machine for grinding out facts. And the explanation he gives of all this is very simple. As a young man he had read poetry with appreciation and pleasure. We find in his "life" that, although he never possessed any real ear for music, he yet derived a certain exquisite delight from the choral services at Cambridge. His journal of the voyage of the Beagle abounds in passages descriptive of his keen enjoyment of the magical charm of the tropics. "My mind," he wrote from Rio Janeiro, "has been since leaving England in a perfect hurricane of delight and astonishment;" and we find him taking "great credit in not being crazy out of pure delight." All this argues a great faculty for receiving pleasurable impressions. But when he returned to England, and became absorbed in his great work, to the entire exclusion of everything that might withdraw him from the closest attention to its processes, he no longer found occasion to exercise that faculty. It lay dormant, and the assiduous cultivation of another side of his consciousness left no time for the development of aesthetic sympathies. No one regretted this more than DARWIN himself. "The loss of these tastes is a loss of happiness," he wrote, "and may possibly be injurious to the intellect." He ascribes the loss to the concentration of his faculties on one absorbing object, and says, characteristically, that if he had to live his life again he would have made a rule to read some poetry and listen to some music at least once every week, "for perhaps the parts of my brain now atrophied would thus have been kept active through use."

There is absolutely nothing whatever in all this to justify the assumption that scientific thought or research, merely as such, has a direct tendency to extinguish the aesthetic sympathies. DARWIN's case, on his own showing, is simply an instance of what is, after all, a cardinal point in his own theory that mental and bodily faculties strengthen by exercise, and become atrophied from disuse. Persistent attention to one subject, and the concentration of one set of faculties on one line of thought, however much it may answer the purpose so far as that immediate object is concerned, has a tendency to weaken our mental grasp of matters that lie out of that direct line. Man's mind is necessarily finite, and what is gained in one direction is lost in another. Just as under an injudicious course of training, the mind is sometimes cultivated at the expense of the body, and just as some mechanics cultivate delicacy of the hand at the expense of strength of the arm, so may one set of intellectual faculties be said to grow and develop at the expense of the others. This is Darwinianism and Evolution, pure and simple.

One of our correspondents seems to have said the last word on this subject when he pointed out that the law of life meant changes. The emotional side of human nature is freshest with the young, and the sense of aesthetic pleasure is an emotional growth. Youth is susceptible and impressionable to outside influences, and the cadence of a verse or the echo of an old song has power to stir the heart of dreaming youth while it falls idly on older ears. "Genius," said COLERIDGE in this connection, "is the carrying into latest life the freshness and sensibilities of childhood." With years, and the more practical interests they bring, we become less imaginative, and less open to sympathetic influences. New interests shut the mind to the impressions they were once ready to receive. "The explosive power of new affection," as Dr. CHALMERS happily puts it, does away with the old sympathy to make room for itself. This is a natural law, and it is singular that in the "Life" of DARWIN we find the reference to this matter coupled with his statement as to his own religious beliefs. He applies to these exactly the same rule that he uses in analysing the decay of the aesthetic faculties; and, in replying to some inquiries that had been made as to what he really thought on revealed religion, he answered with all the humility of a reverent student of science that his studies and researches had not been so directed as to bring out that side of his character, or to make his opinion on such subjects a matter of any consequence. The absence of aesthetic tastes and the dimness of religious belief in DARWIN both came from exactly the same cause—the atrophy; that is, of that part of his consciousness which had fallen into disuse from want of exercise. The sense of beauty is natural and inherent in man, just as is that radical religious instinct of the supernatural which is found in more or less strength in all peoples. But both can be atrophied for want of cultivation, or warped by being cultivated in the wrong direction.

While it is gratifying to know, as we were told in the report of the COMPTROLLER of PRISONS, that crime is decreasing, the information given by the INSPECTOR-GENERAL OF THE INSANE is not so encouraging. We had 2717 insane at the end of 1886, and we had 2821 at the close of 1887, the increase thus being 104. The increase is greater than that of 1886 according to the growth of population. The INSPECTOR-GENERAL finds some comfort in the fact that the proportion of insane to the population in England is 2.86 per 1000, while here it is 2.71 per 1000. It must not be forgotten, however, that the conditions in England are more conducive to insanity than in a new and healthy country such as this. In all old countries the crowded life, the greater poverty, the intense struggle for existence, and the course of hereditary mental derangement tend in the nature of things to the increase of the disease, and it would be expected that England would have in proportion a greater insane record than this country. As an off-set, no doubt, to these conditions of a young nation with its accompanying evil effects, and we have the easier process of bread-getting which permits more frequent lapses into vice and the consequent evil effects that sometimes take the form of insanity. Still whatever weight there may be in a consideration of this kind the insane are increasing much too rapidly. In 10 years our insane population has doubled; in considering this it must be taken into account also that our population has doubled during the same period. An increase of 100 insane a year is, however, a very serious matter. It means that we shall have to be considering very frequently the question of greater accommodation. It is a matter for which there is no remedy. We cannot, as with crime, by increased surveillance and systems of punishment, keep it down. It is the outcome of the conditions of life in the country, and it must be accepted as a great deal. There is one feature, however, in the case which is not disheartening—that is, the recovery rate. For 1887 it was 41.55 per cent, or over four-tenths of the patients. This speaks very well for the treatment received by the patients and the excellence of the system. If there was not a tendency toward overcrowding the rate would be still higher. We grumble sometimes at the cost of our public institutions, but we are likely to be on occasions wise for the penny and foolish for the pound. Ample accommodation we ought to have, and at the present rate of increase of insane patients, we are likely to be compelled to secure it soon.

The diocese of Newcastle is in an unfortunate condition. At a meeting of the Synod, according to an account which we published yesterday, it was said that BISHOP PRABSON "is unable to resign his See, though not declared absolutely insane." For eighteen months the diocese has been virtually without a head, and there appears to be no likelihood of an immediate improvement. There is provision by Statute for the resignation of a Bishop who is by any mental or bodily infirmity permanently incapacitated for the performance of his duty. Here seems to be the difficulty. It has not been decided that Bishop PRABSON is "permanently incapacitated," hence the diocese is powerless in the matter, and the Bishop himself is also helpless. If the Bishop is not absolutely insane he may recover, and would, no doubt, in such a case send in his resignation at once,

The sense of beauty is natural and inherent in man, just as is that radical religious instinct of the supernatural which is found in more or less strength in all peoples. But both can be atrophied for want of cultivation, or warped by being cultivated in the wrong direction.

While it is gratifying to know, as we were told in the report of the COMPTROLLER of PRISONS, that crime is decreasing, the information given by the INSPECTOR-GENERAL OF THE INSANE is not so encouraging. We had 2717 insane at the end of 1886, and we had 2821 at the close of 1887, the increase thus being 104. The increase is greater than that of 1886 according to the growth of population. The INSPECTOR-GENERAL finds some comfort in the fact that the proportion of insane to the population in England is 2.86 per 1000, while here it is 2.71 per 1000. It must not be forgotten, however, that the conditions in England are more conducive to insanity than in a new and healthy country such as this. In all old countries the crowded life, the greater poverty, the intense struggle for existence, and the course of hereditary mental derangement tend in the nature of things to the increase of the disease, and it would be expected that England would have in proportion a greater insane record than this country. As an off-set, no doubt, to these conditions of a young nation with its accompanying evil effects, and we have the easier process of bread-getting which permits more frequent lapses into vice and the consequent evil effects that sometimes take the form of insanity. Still whatever weight there may be in a consideration of this kind the insane are increasing much too rapidly. In 10 years our insane population has doubled; in considering this it must be taken into account also that our population has doubled during the same period. An increase of 100 insane a year is, however, a very serious matter. It means that we shall have to be considering very frequently the question of greater accommodation. It is a matter for which there is no remedy. We cannot, as with crime, by increased surveillance and systems of punishment, keep it down. It is the outcome of the conditions of life in the country, and it must be accepted as a great deal. There is one feature, however, in the case which is not disheartening—that is, the recovery rate. For 1887 it was 41.55 per cent, or over four-tenths of the patients. This speaks very well for the treatment received by the patients and the excellence of the system. If there was not a tendency toward overcrowding the rate would be still higher. We grumble sometimes at the cost of our public institutions, but we are likely to be on occasions wise for the penny and foolish for the pound. Ample accommodation we ought to have, and at the present rate of increase of insane patients, we are likely to be compelled to secure it soon.

The diocese of Newcastle is in an unfortunate condition. At a meeting of the Synod, according to an account which we published yesterday, it was said that BISHOP PRABSON "is unable to resign his See, though not declared absolutely insane." For eighteen months the diocese has been virtually without a head, and there appears to be no likelihood of an immediate improvement. There is provision by Statute for the resignation of a Bishop who is by any mental or bodily infirmity permanently incapacitated for the performance of his duty. Here seems to be the difficulty. It has not been decided that Bishop PRABSON is "permanently incapacitated," hence the diocese is powerless in the matter, and the Bishop himself is also helpless. If the Bishop is not absolutely insane he may recover, and would, no doubt, in such a case send in his resignation at once, showing, is simply an instance of what is, after all, a cardinal point in his own theory that mental and bodily faculties strengthen by exercise, and become atrophied from disuse. Persistent attention to one subject, and the concentration of one set of faculties on one line of thought, however much it may answer the purpose so far as that immediate object is concerned, has a tendency to weaken our mental grasp of matters that lie out of that direct line. Man's mind is necessarily finite, and what is gained in one direction is lost in another. Just as under an injudicious course of training, the mind is sometimes cultivated at the expense of the body, and just as some mechanics cultivate delicacy of the hand at the expense of strength of the arm, so may one set of intellectual faculties be said to grow and develop at the expense of the others. This is Darwinianism and Evolution, pure and simple.

One of our correspondents seems to have said the last word on this subject when he pointed out that the law of life meant changes. The emotional side of human nature is freshest with the young, and the sense of aesthetic pleasure is an emotional growth. Youth is susceptible and impressionable to outside influences, and the cadence of a verse or the echo of an old song has power to stir the heart of dreaming youth while it falls idly on older ears. "Genius," said COLERIDGE in this connection, "is the carrying into latest life the freshness and sensibilities of childhood." With years, and the more practical interests they bring, we become less imaginative, and less open to sympathetic influences. New interests shut the mind to the impressions they were once ready to receive. "The explosive power of new affection," as Dr. CHALMERS happily puts it, does away with the old sympathy to make room for itself. This is a natural law, and it is singular that in the "Life" of DARWIN we find the reference to this matter coupled with his statement as to his own religious beliefs. He applies to these exactly the same rule that he uses in analysing the decay of the aesthetic faculties; and, in replying to some inquiries that had been made as to what he really thought on revealed religion, he answered with all the humility of a reverent student of science that his studies and researches had not been so directed as to bring out that side of his character, or to make his opinion on such subjects a matter of any consequence. The absence of aesthetic tastes and the dimness of religious belief in DARWIN both came from exactly the same cause—the atrophy; that is, of that part of his consciousness which had fallen into disuse from want of exercise. The sense of beauty is natural and inherent in man, just as is that radical religious instinct of the supernatural which is found in more or less strength in all peoples. But both can be atrophied for want of cultivation, or warped by being cultivated in the wrong direction.

EDWARD HANLAN, the popular ex-Champion of MARSHALL'S CELEBRATED TONIC NEBINE, says by its use he has won a front rank

Read this testimonial selected from thousands which are constantly being voluntarily offered by those who have tested its value:—

(Extract from letter.)

"Not feeling well I procured some of Marshall's Tonic Nervine, having been advised to take it. The proof greatly exceeded my expectation, and I am now thoroughly convinced of its grand staying and strengthening properties."
